VAST PROBLEMS TO BE SOLVED BY THE NEW IRISH REPUBLIC

Unrest and Opposition Spirit Strong, But Leaders Hopeful of Solution.

BY JOHN O'BRIEN.

(United Press Staff Correspondent) DUBLIN, Nov. 25.—Ireland expects to begin about Dec. 5 her career as an autonomous state, facing a mass of problems and dangers very similar to those which beset the leaders of the small new nations in south central Europe as an outcome of the great war.

There is the same spirit of unrest and opposition more or less armed and organized, to the constituted government, dislocation of business, personal rivalries and jealousies, lack of experience in the art of government, all complicated and made more difficult of solution by the interminable warfare which followed the withdrawal of the British garrisons.

The one bright spot on the political horizon is the overwhelming demand for peace on the part of the vast majority of the people—peace and resumption of normal trade conditions, prevented now only by the activity of the bands of "irregulars." General Mleschly, commander-in-chief of the National Army, told the United Press, however, that this activity is merely the last despairing outburst of the irreconcilables, who are now withdrawing a central organization or effective leadership in the field.

With the ratification by the British parliament of the Irish Free State constitution, all Ireland comes, nominally, under the rule of Dail Eireann and the Dublin government. This nominal unity is, however, transitory because the Northern parliament, sitting at Belfast will undoubtedly exercise within the stipulated period of one month its treaty right to "opt out" reserving a final decision for a later date.

"Ireland will join us just as soon as we have demonstrated our ability to preserve peace in our own territory," said Pres't Cosgrave to the United Press, and he intimated that assurances to that effect had been unofficially received from Sir John Craig, the Ulster premier, and other leaders of the northern section.

The recent boycott of Ulster goods by the merchants of the South proved that this part of Ireland is Ulster's best customer and economic considerations are expected to outweigh in the near future sentimental, religious or political reasons for Ulster's isolation.

Gravest Problem. The immense problem of national finance is admittedly one of the greatest questions to be faced by the national government. Although the actual divorce between the British and Irish exchequers does not come into force until March 31, 1923, the end of the present financial year, a division of revenue is already being made in regard to customs and Irish government experts are at work on budget problems for the coming year.

It is estimated that there will be a deficit of about $42,000,000 on April 1 next, when the Irish fiscal machinery will be independent of England. This amount is apart from the sums to be paid as compensation for property losses during the fighting of the last six years roughly estimated at present at $13,000,000.

Nobody has paid personal income tax since the days when the Sinn Fein leaders proclaimed "no tax payments" as part of the fight against British rule and, now, when that rule has practically disappeared the people are following the same principle in regard to the calls of the Free State government.

Apart from such sources of revenue as stamp and succession duties, the bulk of the national income is derived from the liquor traffic, the vast brewing and distilling interests paying almost all of it.

In the budget project which comprises an expenditure of about $175,000,000 annually, there is a charge of $31,500,000 for the Free State army, which is to comprise 20,000 men. Considering that there is in process of formation a Civic Guard of 2,500 men to take the place of the old Royal Irish Constabulary, this item in the budget is likely to be bitterly fought in the Dail Eireann, especially by the labor members, who have taken the lead in the fight against militarism.

An army of 20,000 men is considered entirely out of proportion to the defense needs of a country which has no outside enemy.

Labor unrest is another of the difficult problems facing the new government. Labor is exceedingly well organized in Ireland, the Irish Transport and General Workers Union which embraces every trade and occupation, numbering 100,000 members, all of the militant kind, who have taken an active part in the clash with England. For months the most important railroad in Ireland has been idle as a result of the raids of the irregulars. A similar condition obtains in many large industries in the big cities and appeals are being made to the government to take measures to meet the unemployment problem.

From an authoritative source the United Press obtained the following statement of the actual state of Ireland's finances. The total revenue for the whole of Ireland, including the six counties of the north for the year 1920-21 was about $225,000,000. Taking into account the loss of income tax revenue the figure for the present year should be about $180,000,000, of which approximately $135,000,000 would be the share of the Free State.

The estimated total sum required by the government for the present fiscal year is about $180,000,000. This, however, includes the provision for a national army and payment of compensation claims, amounting roughly to $67,500,000, leaving $112,500,000 for other government expenditures. If these figures work out in practice, the government can pay its way until April, 1923, and start out with a national debt of about $275,000,000, including the balance of compensation claims and interest. It is believed that the treaty provision whereby Ireland must take over part of the empire's war debt will be nullified by an agreement between the Free State and the British exchequer, cancelling that part of the war debt as far as Ireland is concerned and wiping out Ireland's claim against England on the ground of a century's overtaxation, admitted by the foremost British financiers.

More than half the population of France is engaged in agriculture. The "English Expositor," by John Bullock, 1616, was the first English dictionary in the strict sense of the term, giving both words and definitions.
